

Marters & Co. SPEAKER PROFILE

EREN MULLER · FOUNDER, MARTERS & CO.

AI talks that end with something you can do on Monday.

I talk about AI and automation the way I would explain it to a friend who runs a business: what actually works, what it costs, and where it quietly falls apart. Data scientist by training, still building things myself most weeks.

What I can talk about

Each track works as a 20-minute keynote, a 45-minute session, or a half-day workshop. No sales pitch from the stage.

01 Automation without losing quality

Where automation raises output and where it quietly damages the work. Drawn from years building this inside a company that runs at Amazon's scale.

02 Machine learning on real data

What large, messy datasets actually give you — using work with UNICEF, where models had to produce insight people could act on, not a leaderboard score.

03 Research first, then application

How to read what is published this month and judge whether it changes anything for your business. A method for separating capability from noise.

04 AI adoption in the UAE and GCC

What regional businesses are trying, what is working, and why copying a foreign playbook rarely survives contact with a local operation.

05 The discovery audit: finding the use cases a business cannot see

Most SMEs across the GCC lose hundreds of hours a year to work nobody decided to do by hand — quotes retyped, invoices checked line by line, the same report rebuilt every Monday. Owners rarely see it, because it is spread thinly across everyone's week. This talk shows how an expert audit surfaces it: sit with the work, measure it, and name the few places where AI genuinely pays.

A bit about me

I studied data science in Rotterdam, then spent years building automation and machine learning inside very large operations — Amazon among them. That is where I learned the unglamorous part: most ideas that sound brilliant in a meeting do not survive a real week of work, and the ones that pay are usually small, boring and close to the floor.

I moved to Dubai and started Marters & Co. because I kept meeting owners here doing work a machine should be doing. I read new research most mornings, I still open the laptop and build, and I would rather leave a room with one thing someone can try on Monday than a strategy nobody opens again.
